Situation Report # 26

Monday, May 24, 2010 at 1200 hrs EDT

David Halstead
State Coordinating Officer

Weather Summary:

- According to the NOAA oil plume model, the oil spill is 55 miles southwest of Pensacola, 120 miles from Port St. Joe, and 280 miles from Clearwater.
- No direct impacts for any part of the Florida coastline are forecast in the next 72 hours. With a high pressure center over the area this morning, winds are light and variable. This should continue through today, though winds should be more frequently from the north early, and more frequently from the southwest later. With light winds and seas two feet or less, conditions should be favorable for deepwater operations. Tomorrow morning will begin similarly, but as the system in the Atlantic begins to exert some influence on the wind pattern, winds will shift to southeasterly and easterly, still below 10 knots. Seas through the period will remain around or below two feet. While there may be some scattered afternoon showers, they will be restricted to land areas.

Current Situation:

- Florida beaches are open.
- Unified Command estimates release rate of oil from Deepwater Horizon at 5,000 barrels per day.
- This event has been designated a Spill of National Significance.
